SCHEDULE "A"

The reasons for the proposed designation are as follows:

Built about 1882 (possibly built by William Dunk, carpenter) and later sold to Arthur Colville, lawyer (1883), this late-Victorian Gothic Revival $1\frac{1}{2}$ storey building is constructed of solid red brick with a limestone foundation.

The irregular plan is composed of 3 sections, with the dominant features being the 3 gables and the 2 protruding one storey brick bay windows, one in the west (front) and one on the south face. Each of these bays has 3 window openings, topped with a buff brick soldier course.

All windows on the first storey are double hung sash originally with 4 lights each. The window openings of the second storey are pointed with 2 over 2 double hung sash. The point is made of wood with an overlaid design. All window openings have limestone sills and louvred shutters.

The original roof was made of wood shingles with the exception of the two verandah roofs made with sheet metal. Gables were all decorated with decorative bargeboards and finials are located on the apex of each gable.

The Booth Street facade had originally a one storey verandah extending across the southerly half running from the projection to the south corner. A glass portico enclosed the front door. The north face also has a verandah running along the length of the face. They were constructed of wood using chamfered posts, wooden brackets and a trellis railing.

Two sets of French doors provide additional access to the building.
