The former Preston Springs Retirement Home was constructed in 1880 as a hotel, called the Del Monte, to cater to the tourists who flocked to the area to experience the healing effects of the mineral springs. Today it stands as the one remaining physical remnant of this era. Designed in the Picturesque Chateau Style, it imbues European ambience and has commanding position on Fountain Street, as King Street terminates at the building's main door.

Constructed of brick, now stuccoed, the 3½ storey building contains a steeply pitched roof with two rows of dormer windows that add another two floors to the whole. The facade largely symmetrical contains a variety of fenestration, including flat and segmentally arched windows.
