STATEMENT OF THE REASONS FOR THE DESIGNATION

THE TEMPLE THEATRE, now the Capitol Theatre, 88 Dalhousie Street, is recommended for designation on architectural and historical grounds.

When the Temple Theatre opened in 1919, it was called "Brantford's supreme playhouse". Designed by Thomas H. Lamb of New York and built at a cost of above $350,000.00 the Temple Theatre boasted the City's first steel girder suspended ceiling, fireproof construction, and a combined heating and ventilation system.

The Temple Theatre has been home to vaudeville, road-shows, the dance, the symphony, photoplays, and motion pictures. In 1929, the theatre was wired for sound at a cost of $30,000.00 and in May of that year, the Temple introduced the "talkie" to Brantford.

The theatre's grand, romantic, ambition for the years immediately after WWI is expressed via the building's attitude toward styling.

The Dalhousie Street frontispiece displays a large, multi-paned thermal window set into the tooled stone facing, and a decorative frieze.

The wide open space of the theatre auditorium, at present capable of seating 1,200, is a dramatic change from the deep and narrow vestibule, foyer and halls. The seating arrangement focuses on a proscenium arch. The walls of the theatre are decorated with pilasters which form arches above themselves. Above the arches are triangular "alcoves". The vaulted ceiling is ornamented with raised ribs. On the diagonal ribs, wheel-shaped chandeliers hang. A huge medallion lying at the confluence of the diagonal ribs is embellished by a sun's ray pattern. The most splendid wheel-shaped chandelier hangs from the centre of the medallion.

Advanced building techniques for the time of its construction, an historic role in the City's performing and cinematic arts, an interior vista plan and fanciful exterior and interior decoration confirm the aptness of dubbing the Temple Theatre, "Brantford's Supreme Playhouse".
