SCHEDULE "B"

Description of Property

The former Adath Jeshurun Synagogue is a three storey, red brick building with a symmetrical facade and a shallow gabled roof behind a decorative parapet, located on the east side of King Edward Avenue, to the north of the intersection of King Edward Avenue and Rideau Street.

Statement of Cultural Heritage Value

The former Adath Jeshurun Synagogue has architectural value as a late example of the Romanesque Revival Style and as an example of early synagogue architecture in Ottawa. The Romanesque Revival style was a popular choice for religious buildings in the 19th century, and was used in other synagogues across Canada, including the oldest surviving synagogue, Congregation Emanuel in Victoria, British Columbia. Constructed in 1904, the architectural features of the Adath Jeshurun Synagogue that are characteristic of the style include its round arched windows, the elaborate round arched entranceway with a fan shaped transom window and brick corbelling and the two tower-like projecting end bays topped with Moorish-inspired decorative metal domes.

The Adath Jeshurun Synagogue was created to accommodate the growing Jewish community of Lowertown and was one of the earliest synagogues established in Ottawa. The synagogue attests to the growth of the Jewish community in Lowertown.

The former Adath Jeshurun Synagogue has historical value for its associations with its designer, architect John W.H. Watts, and alterations by Allan Horwood and Cecil Burgess. Soon after arriving in Ottawa from England, Watts was hired by Thomas Seaton Scott, Chief Architect for the Department of Public Works in Ottawa. Watts was soon elected to the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts and was appointed as the curator of the National Gallery in 1882. He served as the curator of the gallery until 1897. At the end of the 19th century, Watts started a career as an architect in private practice and became well known for designing churches and residences for Ottawa's elite including the Booth Mansion at 252 Metcalfe Street (1909) for J.R. Booth and a house for Andrew Fleck at 500 Wilbrod Street (1901).

Heritage Attributes

Key exterior elements that contribute to the heritage value of the former Adath Jeshurun Synagogue as an excellent example of the Romanesque Revival Style in Ottawa, as designed by John W.H Watts, include its:

- Brick construction with stone foundation;
