Historical Reasons

Built in 1880 for grocer Thomas A. Hall, 163 Mill Street functioned as a corner grocery/variety store for most of its history (1880-1950). In the era before pre-packaged foods and refrigeration, it served the immediate needs of the neighbouring residents for meat, baking supplies, fresh fruit and vegetables. One of numerous small groceries which once existed in London, 163 Mill Street catered to the working people of the neighbourhood, who toiled for the nearby Hyman Tannery, Carling's Brewery, Murray-Selby Shoes and the Canadian Pacific Railway. The grocer and subsequent owners lived in the west two-thirds of the building.

Architectural Reasons

The unusual corner fenestration of 163 Mill Street provides the principal clue to its original function as a corner grocery. Architecturally, this building is a beautifully proportioned, one storey, Regency style, a white brick, hip roof cottage, resting on a brick foundation. Delicately executed, arched window frames define the east third of the building that formerly was the store (the arched windows of the east side elevation may be later, as they are not as finely executed). An operative transom within a decorative frame is set above the recessed entrance door to the store. A separate door, west of the store entrance, now bricked in, formerly gave access to the residence. A long shallow segmental arch over the storefront door and its flanking windows is formed from radiating voussoirs with a brick keystone; the same type of arch appears above the elongated sash windows of the front (Mill Street) elevation; the east and west elevations have only radiating voussoirs. The rear door and verandah are probably later additions.
