Reasons for the designation of The 1844 City Hall and South St. Lawrence Market building at 103 Front Street East.

The South St. Lawrence Market building incorporating Toronto's 1844 City Hall, designed by Henry Bower Lane and rebuilt at the end of the nineteenth century is designated on historic and architectural grounds. It is designated on historic grounds for its associations with the economic, political and social development of the City of Toronto.

The building also of importance architecturally is an example of the work of one of Toronto's first architects, and, although drastically altered, it remains an important example of the late Georgian style of architecture in Ontario. The late nineteenth century alterations, which sheltered the entire market under a great metal and wood arch, represent the one major use of this type of nineteenth century construction remaining in the City and are in themselves as notable as an example of the work and attitudes of their period as Lane's original City Hall. The building also forms part of the extended grouping of religious, public and commercial buildings including St. James' Cathedral, St. Michael's Cathedral and St. Lawrence Hall that forms the heart of nineteenth century Toronto.
