220 Hunter Street East – King George Public School

King George Public School holds cultural heritage value as one of the four 'Royal' schools constructed in Peterborough in the first decades of the twentieth century. Constructed during a time when Peterborough was experiencing a rapid growth in population, the school and its design responded to early twentieth century ideas about educational architecture which focussed on hygiene, cleanliness and safety in school settings. The school features what was, for its time, an extremely modern heating, ventilation and air conditioning system, full indoor plumbing, and wide central staircases to facilitate rapid evacuation in case of an emergency. Architecturally, the school is an excellent example of a civic building constructed as part of the City Beautiful movement, which sought to increase the liveability of cities through the provision of green space and the development of monumental civic structures.

The school is also an integral aspect of the wider Hunter Street East landscape and a local landmark in the surrounding neighbourhood and the city as a whole. Its monumental architecture and prominent siting on Armour Hill render it a visual architectural feature and local landmark which assist in defining Ashburnham as a holistic neighbourhood with localized services and structures. In continuous operation as a public school for over 100 years, the building is an important community asset with significant historical and associative value for local residents.
