Description of Property

The approximately 1/3 acre property at 370 King Street West -- known also as the J.K. Tett Creativity Center -- is of cultural heritage value not only for its individual character defining elements, but as part of a cultural heritage landscape of an evolving nineteenth century industrial complex, which includes a larger cluster of protected heritage properties such as 390 King St West, 440 King Street West and the nearby remains of the HMS St. Lawrence. The cultural heritage value of the property at 370 King Street West lies in its design and physical values, as well in its contextual and historical associations. The property, with its limestone masonry building, represents an important part of a cultural heritage landscape of an evolving nineteenth century industrial complex which was described as the largest brewery and distillery in Upper Canada in the mid-nineteenth century. Elements that define the property's physical/design value include the general form of the J.K. Tett Centre Creativity Centre consisting of a long, relatively low structure with a medium-pitched gable roof. Important architectural details include limestone masonry construction including voussoired flat arches at openings; the vestiges of original elements of the buildings including stone corbels and voussoirs at filled-in window and door openings; and the squared stone quoins on the building. Historically, this property is associated with several nationally and locally important individuals and organizations such as James Morton; the Department of National Defence; and the City of Kingston. It is an important landmark on King Street West and on the Kingston Waterfront.

Statement of Cultural Heritage Value/ Statement of Significance

The cultural heritage value of the property at 370 King Street West lies in its design and physical values, as well in its historical and contextual associations.

370 King Street West's design value is derived from its importance as part of the core section in one of the few remaining nineteenth century industrial complexes in Kingston. It is important not only for its individual architectural elements, but also as part of a coherent whole. The property, with its limestone masonry building, represents an important part of a cultural heritage landscape of an evolving nineteenth century industrial complex which was described as the largest brewery and distillery in Upper Canada in the mid-nineteenth century. Elements that define the property's design value include the general form of the J.K. Tett Centre building consisting of a long, relatively low structure with a medium-pitched gable roof. Important architectural details include limestone masonry construction including voussoired flat arches at openings; the vestiges of original elements of the buildings including stone corbels and voussoirs at filled-in window and door openings; and the squared stone quoins on the building. Indeed, despite the various 20th century renovations, the property can still be understood as a part of a brewery/distillery complex. The property also has value for its significant archaeological resources.

The property's historical/associative value stems from its association with several nationally and locally important individuals and organizations such as James Morton and the Department of National Defence. Until about 1900, this property was part of the Morton Brewery and Distillery complex. It has a historical association with James Morton, a leading nineteenth century Kingston industrialist and key player in the political and economic history of nineteenth century Upper Canada. After it closed as a brewery and distillery, the property went through several owners. Following the First World War, the building was acquired by the Federal government and incorporated into the Sydenham Military Hospital, and later became part of the regional headquarters of the Department of National Defence. In 1968, the property was purchased by the City of Kingston and has since seen multiple uses for various community social service and cultural activities.

It is an important landmark on King Street West and on the Kingston Waterfront. Strategically, the complex's proximity to the waterfront was a key aspect of the Brewery/Distillery's operations; the remains of a wharf once used by the complex is still visible.
