HISTORICAL BACKGROUND:

1. The Beach:

Development of the East Toronto neighbourhood known as the Beach began in 1853. The area remained the setting of country estates until the final quarter of the 19th century.

With the extension of street car and steamer service from the City of Toronto in the 1870s, the eastern beaches attracted both occasional visitors to amusement parks and other recreational pursuits, and seasonal residents who occupied tents and cottages along the lakeshore. Balmy Beach Park was established in 1876. The Kew Farm, located east of Woodbine Avenue, was renamed Kew Gardens in 1878 when it was converted to a "picnic park" with campsites and cabins. During the 1890s, new parks joined the existing ones near Woodbine, Kew and Balmy Beaches. This development was accompanied by a move to year-round occupancy and improved roads and transit.

Queen Street East was extended east from Woodbine Avenue in 1887. The following year, the extension of the street east from Woodbine to Lee Avenue coincided with the incorporation of the Village of East Toronto (the community achieved town status in 1903 prior to being annexed by the City of Toronto in 1908). By 1896, the streetcar line reached Balsam Avenue.

2. 93 Balsam Avenue:

Following the extension of the streetcar line to Balsam Avenue, part of the latter street was registered in a plan of subdivision in 1895. The property at 93 Balsam Avenue remained undeveloped when it was transferred from Robert Beaty, a King Street East banker, to A. J. R. Snow, a barrister on Sherbourne Street. The house at 93 Balsam Avenue was completed in 1899 when William J. Gardiner, a jeweller, purchased the property. Gardiner resided on-site with his wife and five children and acquired three adjoining vacant lots. In 1906, Gardiner sold the property at 93 Balsam. The house remained vacant until 1910, when William Pepper began a 30-year tenancy.

In 1940, Edward M. Caudie, a toolmaker, bought the property. Caudie's daughter, Nancy, retained the property until her death in 1997. Nancy Caudie Wright's artistic career began at age 16 when she apprenticed as a commercial artist with the Harry Lane Studio, a Toronto advertising firm. She did advertising layouts and illustrations for the Timothy Eaton Company for eight years before joining Bomark Engravings as an illustrator. Nancy Caudie Wright worked briefly as a freelance artist before forming a studio with artists Bill Winter and Jack Bush. During this period, she specialized in book covers and editorial illustrations for major publications. From 1948 to 1953, Nancy Caudie Wright served as art director of the Canadian Home Journal. As a designer at the firm of Samson, Mathews in the 1950s, one of her colleagues was Group of Seven artist A. J. Casson.

In 1940, Nancy Caudie Wright became the first female member of the Art Directors Club of Toronto. With the support of A. J. Casson, member of the Board of the Ontario College of Art, she began a 10-year career as a teacher at that institution in 1958. While teaching and working as a commercial artist, Nancy Caudie Wright pursued her interest in watercolour painting. She exhibited with the Ontario Society of Artists and the Watercolour Society of Canada before holding a one-woman show at Toronto's Upstairs Gallery in 1958. Following her retirement in 1969, Nancy Caudie Wright concentrated on painting trips with fellow artist Doris McCarthy, a former resident of Balsam Avenue. According to artist Allan O'Marra, "Wright's watercolours...show an unerring sense of design, masterful draftsmanship, flawless colour harmonies, and a craftsman's understanding of the medium. But most of all, they show her empathy for the Canadian landscape and her ability to respond directly and spontaneously to it."

ARCHITECTURAL DESCRIPTION:

The William J. Gardiner House is a modest single-storey bungalow typical of the first generation of houses constructed in the East Toronto neighbourhood during its transition from a seasonal to a permanent community. Constructed of wood frame, the cottage is clap with shiplap siding. Its rectangular plan is covered by a hip roof with a brick chimney on the north slope. The roof extends over an open, raised verandah that wraps around the front (west) and side (north and south) walls. The verandah has a moulded wood base and wood columns and railings. The principal (west) façade is symmetrically organized into three bays. The entrance with a panelled wood door is centered between two extended window openings with shutters. The openings, which contain multi-paned diamond-patterned windows, are repeated on the sidewalls. The south façade has a projecting bay window, while the north wall displays diminutive rectangular window openings. The interiors and the three rear (east) additions are not included as significant elements in the Reasons for Designation.

CONTEXT:

The William J. Gardiner House is located on the east side of Balsam Avenue in the first block north of Queen Street East. The house is set back from the street on an elevated lot. It is set apart by its modest form and wood cladding in a street with larger houses with brick or mixed cladding. At 132 Balsam Avenue, to the north, "Pinecrest" (1904) is a residential building included on the City of Toronto Inventory of Heritage Properties.

SUMMARY:

The property at 93 Balsam Avenue is identified for architectural and historical reasons. Built for William J. Gardiner, the house was associated for the past half-century as the childhood home and long-term residence of Nancy Caudie Wright, a noted Toronto artist. The house, with its diminutive form, wood cladding, and modest detailing is indicative of the cottages constructed in the area when East Toronto developed as a summer resort community outside the City of Toronto. Predating the annexation of the area by the City of Toronto in 1908, the William J. Gardiner House is an important surviving example of the early development of the Balmy Beach neighbourhood.

Short Statement of Reasons for Designation

William J. Gardiner House
93 Balsam Avenue

The property at 93 Balsam Avenue is recommended for designation for architectural and historical reasons. The house at 93 Balsam Avenue was completed in 1899 for Toronto jeweller William J. Gardiner. It was the residence of Toronto artist Nancy Caudie Wright from 1940 until her death in 1997.

The William J. Gardiner House is a single-storey bungalow constructed of wood frame and clad in shiplap siding. The rectangular plan is covered by a hip roof with a brick chimney. The roof extends over an open raised wraparound verandah with wood detailing. On the symmetrically organized principal (west) facade, a central entrance has a panelled wood door. The west facade and sidewalls (north and south) display extended flat-headed window openings with multi-paned windows and shutters. There are rectangular windows on the north wall and a single bay window on the south wall. The interiors and three rear (east) additions to the original house are not included as significant elements in the Reasons for Designation.

The William J. Gardiner House is located on the east side of Balsam Avenue north of Queen Street East. It is indicative of the modest wood frame houses constructed when East Toronto developed as a seasonal community east of Toronto and an important surviving example of the early growth of the Balmy Beach neighbourhood.
