REASONS FOR DESIGNATION

Holy Trinity, the oldest church in use by the Anglican Diocese of Toronto, has gained a mark for itself in both the history of York and the Anglican Church. The building, changed with church doctrine and with the growth of its congregation, has always played an important role in the community. It has retained certain architectural elements which are reflective of their time, and is a prime example of Georgian church architecture.

The structure, built in 1830, has remained intact since its expansion in 1840. (The church was dismantled and reconstructed with a 20 foot addition when moved to its present site in 1950). Important features include the roof configuration, placement of the entrance, symmetry of its elements, and the orientation of the main axis. It is all the elements pertaining to this period of expansion, and earlier, that give the church its architectural significance along with its historical value.

HISTORICAL SIGNIFICANCE

From "The Journal of Mary O'Brien", on the opening of Holy Trinity:

February 28 - We had service in the morning in our new church. Dr. Strachan came out expressly to officiate and read for the First Lesson The Dedication of the Temple. He preached for an hour and a half a sermon which, if not perfect as a composition, was so good in matter and feeling that most of the party left the church with the most chariabile feelings towards the preacher.

So began the first day of Holy Trinity. Now located at Jane and Brooke Streets, it is the oldest original church still in use in the Anglican Diocese of Toronto. Founded in 1830 by William Parsons and his brother-in-law, Benjamin Thorne, its construction (originally located on the west side of Yonge Street what is now the intersection of Royal Orchard and Yonge Street) was financially supported by wealthy relatives and friends in England as well as by prominent local families.

By the 1830s, Thornhill had become a hive of pioneer industry. Among the many businesses were four grist mills, three saw mills, four tanneries, a brickyard, two distilleries, seven taverns and several stores. It was during this bustle of activity that the church was constructed. John Edey, who was a carpenter and member of the congregation known to have built St. Lukes Roman Catholic Church (1847) at the corner of Church and Colbourne Streets, may have been one of the builders of Holy Trinity.

By 1839-1840 the congregation had doubled in size. Thus, the church was widened, creating the present width of forty eight feet. It is thought that the balcony was added at this time and used as a choir gallery.

The church was originally furnished with box pews. These pews had two primary attributes. First, they helped to prevent freezing drafts on the lower limbs in winter. Second, they could be rented to parishioners to raise funds for parish expenses. With the expansion in 1840, additional pews were added.

In 1860, the second rectory was constructed. The original had been built at the time of Reverend Mortimer but he found it too small and uncomfortable and consequently built his own home at 8000 Yonge Street. The second rectory was more popular and was used by the rectors until it was sold, in 1976. A third rectory was then purchased at 2 Marie Court.

During the 1920s, the need for additional space became an increasing concern. Since the church had no basement there were no accommodations for a Sunday School or a meeting hall. In 1928, a drive shed was torn down to make room for a brick parish hall. (It was the later sale of this hall that helped defray the cost of moving Holy Trinity to the larger lot on Brooke Street).

The widening of Yonge Street in 1949 reduced the available parking space. There was increased traffic hazards to parishioners crossing Yonge Street when parked on the east side of the road. Tragically, two members of the congregation were killed and a former church warden was injured while crossing the street.

In 1950, the church was carefully dismantled and re-erected above a good basement. The architect for the removal of the church was the late Mr. W. Sydney Kertland, a member of the congregation and a great-grandson of one of the founders, William Parsons. Except for the additional length of twenty feet, it remained architecturally unchanged.

The basement hall soon became too small for a growing Sunday School. In 1960, a red brick hall designed by G.F.T. Rounthwaite, an architect and a member of Holy Trinity, was erected beside the church.

The rectors of Holy Trinity have also left their marks in history. Rev. Isaac Fidler was the unofficial rector for a short time in 1932 before Rev. George Mortimer. Rev. Fidler was a teacher of oriental languages who had come from the States with his wife. He was once described as "a remarkable person of tall West-morland mould resembling the common pictures of Wordsworth".¹ When Fidler returned to England he wrote "Observation on Profession, Literature Manners and Emigration in the United States and Canada" which included many references to Thornhill.

Rev. George Mortimer was Rev. Fidler's successor. He was from London and received his Master of Arts at Cambridge University. Rev. Mortimer arrived in Thornhill with his three sons before sending for his wife and three daughters. He was a frail man deformed by a childhood illness but was well respected and loved in the community. After his death in 1844, some of his correspondence was published, titled "The Life and Letters of Rev. George Mortimer".

The fourth rector of the church was Rev. Robert Shanklin. Rev. Shanklin was described as a witty Irishman and a musical genius. He established the Farmer Club during the 1860s which held the Penny Weekly Readings. These meetings, a series of helpful discussion between farmers, performed a great service to the community.

Twelve other rectors succeeded Rev. Robert Shanklin in Holy Trinity's history. Rev. Robert Grisdale is the present rector.

"The history of Holy Trinity Anglican Church is a history of Thornhill itself; the church has gone through the ups and downs of the village. In essence, Holy Trinity is a testimony to the generations of loyal and dedicated people who have served God well and in so doing have contributed immeasurably to their community".²

ARCHITECTURAL DESCRIPTION

Now set at the site of Jane and Brooke Streets, the church was moved from the west side of what is now the intersection of Yonge Street and Royal Orchard. It faces east to Brooke Street down Jane, flanked to the south by the parish hall which was built in 1960. There is an approach up 11 steps to the front and a ramp on the north down to parking. To the back is the open field of the Macdonald House. To the north of the parking lot is residential housing. The plan is rectangular and reflects the layout of current church idealogy.

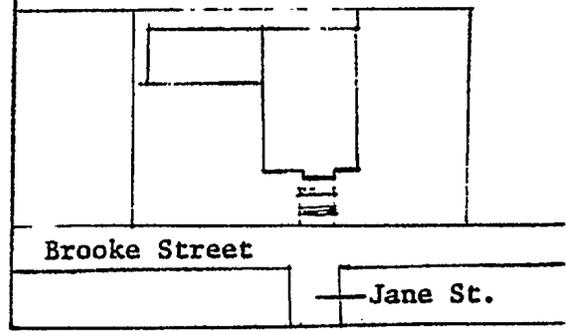

The style of the church is Classical in transition to Gothic. The Classical elements are seen in the fluted pillars and pilasters, the flat arches between the pillars, the pediments over the exterior doors and the quoins simulating stone on the exterior corners of the building. Gothicization appears in the pointed arch of the windows. However, the original windows in the front of the building retain a Classical element in the form of delicate tracery; this detail can also be seen in the modern window added in the sacristy on the north side in 1950. All of the other windows gradually lost their Classical tracery and clear glass when they were replaced with stained glass in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

The church bell, which summons modern-day parishioners to church at the 9:15 and 11:00 morning services, is also rung at weddings and tolled at funerals. It was cast in bronze and, according to the inscription around the centre, was made by Thomas Mear of London in 1841. The bell, which was imported from England after the consecration, is 23½ inches in diameter and twenty-one inches in height; it is mounted in the belfry on a great wooden wheel.

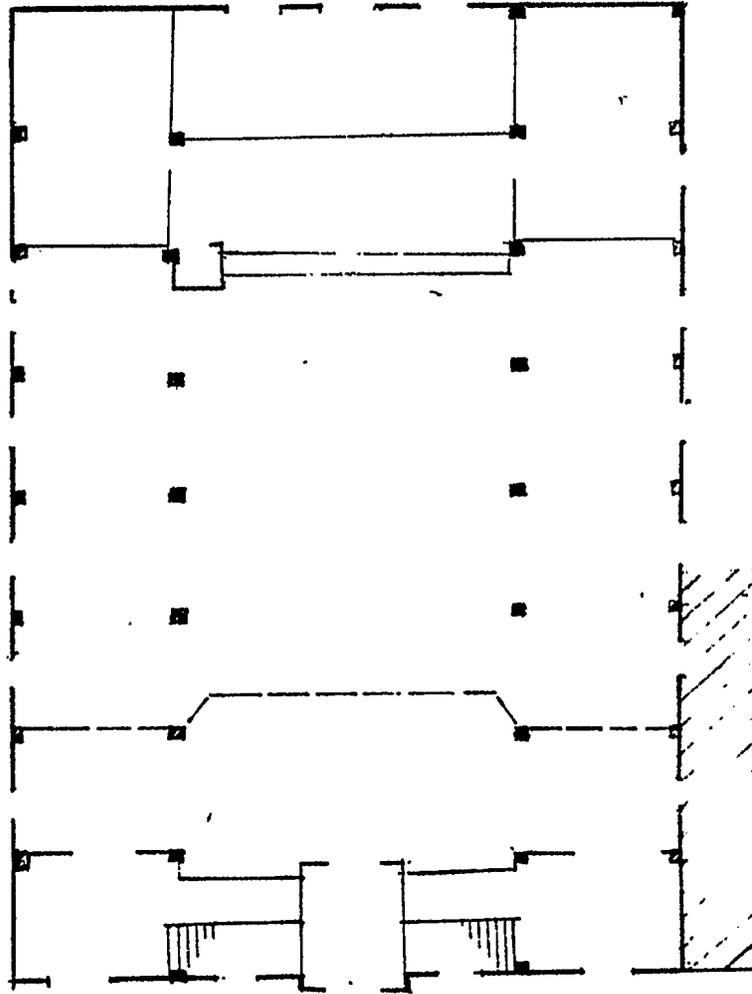

The original pulpit in the church stood much higher than the present pulpit and was reached by several steps. It was located on the north side of the church, near the present-day memorial chapel. There was no chancel at that time. In 1914, the original altar was replaced with the present one as a memorial to Joseph Robinson and his family. In the same year, the present pulpit replaced the old high pulpit.
