Reasons for Designation
571 Queens Avenue

Historical Reasons

This house was built between 1890 and 1895. The first occupant was Eustace Bucke but by 1905 Herbert P. Allen was listed as the occupant. It is one of the later additions to Queens Avenue which had been established as a prestigious address for the more successful business entrepreneurs of London at the time.

Architectural Reasons

This house is a two and a half storey white brick building with Queen Anne influences. The front gable features a three bay oriel window with a broken arch pediment above it. The gable has fish scale wood shingles and modillions. The building rests on a rusticated stone foundation. The main floor features a large window divided into three parts which are separated by pleasing spindle-shaped mullions with the larger window portion in the centre and narrow sections on either side. The upper portion of the window has a stained glass transom, full width. The porch has its original details such as modillions, dentils, fluted posts and pilasters.

The double leaf front door leads into a small vestibule. On the west façade is a small rectangular window close to the front façade, then a tall window placed higher with a transom, dentils and a two-section window bordered with coloured glass panes. At the south end of the west façade is a bay window with newer siding.

Contextual Reasons

This house is part of an important streetscape stretching from Wellington Street on the west to Adelaide on the east. It faces the southern part of East Woodfield Heritage Conservation District. The design of this building is similar to the red brick house to the east and reflects the building styles of this period of development.
