SCHEDULE 'B'

The William Street facade of the John Hext House is designated for both historical and architectural reasons.

The house, built in 1880 by John Hext, owner of a Brantford carriage factory, exhibits a handsome, mostly intact facade designed in the Italianate style. The front elevation shows a symmetrical arrangement of parts - a wider central bay recessed between taller profile end bays and a symmetrical placement of long, rounded and segmentally-arched windows and doorway (typical Italianate features). In the central bay, French windows lie above the double-door entrance. This doorway is surmounted by a rounded transom light bearing John Hext's monogram. A closely-aligned pair of long, rounded windows on the first storey and a couple of segmentally-arched windows on the second floor pierce the white brick masonry of the end bays. A raised brick and wood moulding at the cornice, prominent brackets at the eaves and a deep roof overhang span across the facade. The facade also offers an interesting roof line consisting of the end bays' pediments rising above a slightly-pitched hip roof. Other elements adorning the building include a string course between the first and second storeys, quoins and double chimneys.

Furthermore, the John Hext House is appropriately located in a neighbourhood of two storey brick houses including historic Lawfield (the Red Cross building) on the opposite corner.
