Description

Located on the southwest corner of University Avenue and Queen Street West, the property at 250 University Avenue known as the Bank of Canada Building contains an eight storey plus penthouse office building constructed between 1955 and 1958, designed in the Neo-Georgian architectural style by the architectural firm of Marani & Morris. Built as the Toronto Agency offices for the Bank of Canada and housing additional space for lease, the granite-clad building with fine detailing is situated prominently on University Avenue and contributes to the ceremonial boulevard's present-day character and formal landscape.

Statement of Cultural Heritage ValueDesign and Physical Value

The Bank of Canada Building at 250 University Avenue has design and physical value as an excellent representative example of a mid-20th century office building, designed in the Neo-Georgian architectural style. The scale, form and massing of the building is emblematic of this building type, occupying a full city block and commanding a strong presence on the southwest corner of University Avenue and Queen Street West. The building's Neo-Georgian architectural style is evident in the tripartite arrangement of the primary (east) façade, the two side facades, and the restrained yet high-quality materiality of the building's cladding. The building's design and physical value is also related to its high degree of craftsmanship and artistic merit, exhibited through the purposeful integration of art both on the exterior and within the interior lobby, with works commissioned from and executed by leading 20th century artists including Cleeve Horne, Louis Tempore, Alexander Scott Carter, Stanley Arculus and Alan Caswell Collier. The building is also reflective of the design intent of the University Avenue bylaw, which sought to establish a consistent streetscape and a high level of architectural design along this ceremonial route.

Historical and Associative Value

The historical and associative value of the Bank of Canada Building is apparent through its direct associations with the Bank of Canada is a significant institution within the history of the Canada and which has contributed significantly to the growth and development of Canada's economy through the 20th century. The building retains features that reflect its association with the Bank of Canada, including the federal coat of arms above the primary entrance, and is a significant property that speaks to the presence of the institution within Toronto.

The Bank of Canada Building is reflective of the work of the architectural firm Marani & Morris, one of Toronto's leading 20th century modern architectural practices. Comprised of a partnership between Ferdinand Herbert Marani and Robert Schofield Morris, the firm was a leading proponent of conservative modernism in the mid-20th century, responsible for numerous high quality projects for institutional and corporate clients. The Bank of Canada Building is emblematic of the firm's high quality work, with a decidedly modern massing and form that remains steeped in the principles of classicism and an honesty of materials. The opening of the Bank of Canada Building coincided with Robert Morris receiving the Gold Medal from the Royal Institute of British Architects in 1958, and shortly before the promotion of Marvin Francis Allan to partner in 1959. The firm continues to practice today as RDHA.

Contextual Value

Contextually, the Bank of Canada Building at 250 University Avenue maintains and supports the character of the University Avenue Precinct, one of Toronto's major streets and a significant ceremonial avenue that is home to a collection of significant buildings associated with important institutions in Toronto's history and constructed during the 20th century. The Bank of Canada Building is historically and visually linked with its surroundings, including the Confederation Life Building which was designed in accordance with the University Avenue by-law, and the Superior Court of Justice (formerly the Metropolitan Toronto Courthouse), which was a commission of Marani, Morris and Allan. It is also linked to the modernist design of University Avenue, which was completed between 1960 and 1962 to the designs of Dunnington-Grubb & Stensson. The building also contributes to the landmark intersection of University Avenue and Queen Street West, and is one of the four significant buildings at that intersection which reflect the history and evolution of the area from the Town of York through to the present-day.
