OF THE

CORPORATION OF THE CITY OF CAMBRIDGE

The "Old Township Hall" is designated for historic reasons.

The building was erected in 1838 by Alexander Scrimger, Carpenter, and Duncan Shepherd, who did the interior work. It served as the Township Hall of Dumfries until that township was divided in two by the creation of Waterloo and Brant Counties. Originally thought to have been a tall narrow clapboard building, it has since been much altered, although still retaining the general shape that gave it the name "Noah's Ark".

The building served as the first home of many early organizations and institutions such as Galt Collegiate Institute, Trinity Church, an early library and theatre group, as well as the seat of local government. It is said that the first of Lord Durham's meetings to be held outside of Toronto, inquiring into the causes of the 1937 Rebellion, was held here.

The building was replaced as the seat of local government when the new Town Hall was built in 1857, and moved to its present location on Cambridge Street at that time.
