SCHEDULE "B" to

THE DOVER-DALY HOUSE c. 1839
20 Platoff Street
Niagara-on-the-Lake

In 1835 James Crooks sold the lot on which this house stands to Henry Sewell, a carpenter, whose son Thomas, the publisher, subdivided the property, selling this portion to Thomas Dover late in 1838. The property was bought by Edward Dixon, carpenter, in 1842, with the increase in value registered in the transaction suggesting that a small house existed on the property at that time. It changed hands again in 1844, being purchased by Thomas Eedson, also a carpenter. Until this time it had been a tiny lot of thirty feet along the street by fifty feet in depth, a very small space when municipal services of water supply and the like were not known. However, Eedson had purchased the adjoining property on King Street, part of which was retained and added to this plot.

More recently, this board and batten cottage, very much weather-beaten, was pronounced virtually impossible to preserve: it took a former owner many months to bring it back to 'life', and it has never ceased to be coveted since.

The one-and-a-quarter storey board and batten saltbox, known as the Dover-Daly House, illustrates the typical local building, in a vernacular of classical inspiration, which forms the excellent background building of the old Town of Niagara. It is principally important for this and its essential role in the streetscape.

This is a very simple small house, the front door opening into a larger room, with two small bedrooms originally off this. In the lean-to part of the saltbox behind was the kitchen with a stair to a loft in the roof of the main section. A little fine detail has survived, including a small mantelpiece, but the conversion added new and enjoyable dimensions for a small household. The house has its original window divisions restored and still contains some simple early 19th century trim. The external board and batten finish may be a later covering but a finish becoming popular about the time of this building's construction.

The reasons for designation include the building's importance as streetscape and its significance as a structure typical of the smaller, older background building of Niagara-on-the-Lake. Designated parts include the exterior envelope of the dwelling.
