Statement of Cultural Heritage Value or Interest

The Creighton-Moore Farmstead at 9104 Dublin Line has physical and design value as a representative example of a late-nineteenth-century agricultural residence in the Ontario Gothic Cottage style. The one-and-a-half storey residential building exhibits features typical of this style, including the cross-gable roof, squared cut ashlar and rubble construction, quoining, decorative wooden bargeboard, stone sills and lintels, transom, sidelight windows, central gable peaks with arched window openings, and red brick chimneys.

The Creighton-Moore Farmstead at 9104 Dublin Line has historical and associative value due to its connections with the Creighton, Moore, and Chisholm families. These families significantly contributed to the agricultural and social history of the region. John Creighton, one of the first Scottish settlers in Scotch Block during the 1820s, initially cleared the land for agricultural use. He played a key role in establishing the first Presbyterian church in the area and was actively involved in local agriculture and politics. Ownership of the property remained within the Creighton family and their direct descendants intermittently until the mid-twentieth century. William Moore Jr., a descendant of United Empire Loyalists, constructed the extant dwelling in the 1870s and operated a sheep farm on the subject property. The Moore family remained involved in the local Presbyterian community, contributing to the Boston Presbyterian Church and its associated cemetery. In the 1940s, the property was acquired by James “Lloyd” Chisholm, a descendant of John Creighton. Chisholm established a successful dairy and later horse-breeding operation on the property, playing a key role in the development of the standardbred horse racing industry in Ontario. His involvement in the foundation of the Ontario Sires Stakes program and his contributions to the Standardbred Breeders of Ontario Association are recognized as significant achievements in the field of Canadian horse racing.

The Creighton-Moore Farmstead at 9104 Dublin Line has contextual value as an important part of the rural agricultural landscape in the Scotch Block area of Halton Hills. The property remains physically, functionally, and visually linked to its surroundings, with the c.1870s farmhouse set within a broader agricultural setting that includes rear fields and windrows along the property edges. The farmhouse, constructed by William Moore Jr., reflects the rural character of the area and contributes to the historical continuity of farmstead development in the region. While modern development has encroached upon the surrounding landscape, the property maintains its agricultural roots, reinforcing the historic and agricultural character of the Scotch Block.
