The white brick, two and a half storey house at 190 Bridport is an important contribution to the streetscape. This Colonial Revival inspired house was built in 1908. The house is of interest for architectural reasons. The elements of the design give this house a solid presence. The house possesses a fieldstone foundation 18 inches thick which is very pronounced at the back and east sides. It is a symmetrical, severe looking house with unusual chamfered columns supporting the front porch (with rounded and square sections). The wooden columns surmount a porch foundation which combines smooth and rusticated stone in alternating layers. A small landing on the porch can be accessed from the second floor. The hip roof was originally wood shingle, and has two prominent chimneys. The house has a centre hall plan. There are groupings of triple brackets under the eaves and there are two large dormers. Sandstone sills and window heads can be seen throughout. Many of the upper sashes in the windows possess a lancet tracery pattern created by the use of wooden mouldings.
